On-farm trials involving the participation or use of farmers' fields have been applied in various studies, including: taungya and intercropping trials; mother-baby breeding trials aimed at selecting for specific traits in breed; augmented block designs (ABD) with emphasis on technology or selection of best or adaptable variety of crop under conditions of

The use of augmented designs minimises plot number, while still enabling the researcher's and farmer's questions to be answered. The proposed design fills a methodological gap between informal farmer observation trials (where no statistical analysis is attempted) and larger scale extension trials (composed of simple treatment comparisons tested over a large number of farms).

The effectiveness of on-farm and/or on-station early generation yield testing was examined to maximize the genetic gains for sorghum yield under smallholder farmer production conditions in West Africa. On-farm first-stage yield trials (augmented design, 150 genotypes with subsets of 50 genotypes tested per farmer) and second-stage yield trials (replicated  $\alpha$ -lattice design, 21 test genotypes ...

On-farm first-stage yield trials (augmented design, 150 genotypes with subsets of 50 genotypes tested per farmer) and second-stage yield trials (replicated  $\alpha$ -lattice design, 21 test genotypes) were conducted, as well as on-station  $\alpha$ -lattice first- and second-stage trials under contrasting phosphorous conditions.

Farmer participatory research - IRRI Rice Knowledge Bank

Farmer participatory research. Farmer participatory research (FPR) is an approach, which involves encouraging farmers to engage in experiments in their own fields so that they can learn, adopt new technologies and spread them to other farmers. With the scientist acting as facilitator, farmers and scientists closely work together from initial design of the research project to data gathering, analysis, final conclusions, and follow-up actions.

yield testing (augmented, farmer-as-incomplete-block, multiple lattice, and augmented p-rep) indicated that acceptable heritabilities (0.57 to 0.65) could be obtained with all designs for test-ing 150 progenies in 20 trials and 75 plots per farmer. Ease of implementation and risk of errors would thus be key criteria for choice of design.

Farmer participatory trials are usually kept simple with restricted number of treatments. However, this needs not be the case if the desired aim of coverage and adoption is to be achieved. Augmented Block Designs (ABDs) involve the expansion of blocks to accommodate additional treatments, which usually appear once in the entire experiment.
